That's a good idea, Andrew. I'd recommend using the word "Disclaimers" instead of caveats for public facing content, as long as that doesn't get confused with the disclaimers button.

Another idea to raise the profile of caveats –

We can ensure that users'/management eyeballs see that caveats are prominently displayed for each layer by splitting the "More Information" panel, which is collapsed when users arrive, to have two side-by-side sections:

- Background/Information and
- Caveats

These headers would be visible even when the panel is collapsed.

It might be good to develop or ask the office of origin to develop the essential 1-5 caveats in a standard bullet format. These could be presented and highlighted as caveats in a standardized fashion on:

- the "More Information" panel AND
- the Disclaimer button AND
- the summary of each data source (which we understand will be presented on the web page that will serve as the launching point for the National PFAS Data Explorer

This way, users will be exposed to similar and consistent information about each layer.

I haven't been following the "caveats and messaging" aspect of the site too closely. I just got some questions/comments from my AA (and will need to give her an update – with a focus on the drinking water issues). See items below for concerns raised, follow up questions from me, and some suggestions.
